Uncle Sam is Also Studying the Distribution and Habits of Alfalfa, One of the West's Best and Most Hardy Forage Plants—Particularly Adapted to the Semi-Arid Regions

Albuquerque, Sept. 16.—Several interesting experiments in grass-seeding have just been carried out by G. A. Pearson, in charge of the forest experiment station on the Coconino national forest in central Arizona, with a view to improving the quality of the range on the national forests in this district.

The Coconino forest offers an excellent field for these experiments, since small portions of the range have in the past been badly depleted by overgrazing. Moreover, the native grasses as a rule in this region start very late in the spring, with the result that forage is scarce on large portions of the forest during the early part of the summer. It is possible, therefore, that the carrying capacity of the range may be greatly increased by introducing some cultivated forage plant, which will restock the denuded areas and also afford pasturage earlier in the season than the native grasses.

In this region is found considerable land which is half-timbered and half open park, and on large areas the ground water is very close to the surface, keeping the surface soil moist even during dry months when there is no local drought. It is especially desirable to secure a stand of grass or other forage crop on these moist areas, since they are unadapted to either farming or the growth of timber. The vegetation is usually sparse, mainly on account of excessive trampling by cattle in the past.

Six strips of approximately one acre each have accordingly been sown with a number of grasses, which, it seems likely, may succeed on this land, such as orchard grass, bromo grass, Kentucky blue grass, timothy, red top, and Italian rye. On each acre strip the seed was broadcasted and two-thirds of the strip harrowed before sowing. One-half of the harrowed area was then gone over with a brush drag, in order to fix the seed in the ground. Thus each strip will furnish comparative results on three different methods of sowing. The results of this experiment will undoubtedly be followed with great interest by stockmen in this locality.

Uncle Sam is also studying the distribution and the habits of alfalfa, one of the west's best forage plants, with a view of determining the possibility of growing it upon overgrazed ranges, and introducing it upon national forest ranges where hitherto it has been unknown, or has occurred only in limited quantities.

Alfalfa is a very valuable and hardy forage plant, which constitutes one of the principal spring feeds upon many of the semi-arid ranges of the southwest. Stock fattens rapidly upon it, and the gain is good, hard to lose and easily lost through shipment.

Many stockmen have endeavored to introduce it upon their ranges, and in most instances their efforts have failed. The cause of this failure is now found to lie in the fact proven by tests made by the bureau of plant industry, that the seed sold by seed firms seldom has over ten per cent germinative power, and that nine-tenths of the seed sowed is worthless.

The United States forest service has been in receipt of many requests for the planting of alfalfa upon spring ranges within the national forests, and has decided to act upon them. Tests having proved the impossibility of securing satisfactory supplies of the seed through the ordinary channels, A. W. Simpson, plant ecologist, was detailed to the work of securing a supply that would meet all requirements.

Beginning his investigations upon the Sequoia forest in California he discovered that by setting aside suitable tracts upon which the plant was abundant, and watching its growth, seed with a germinative power in excess of ninety per cent could be secured in large quantities, and at a cost much below the prevailing market prices. As a result of his investigations the forest service has arranged to set aside certain tracts in the southwest this fall for the purpose of cultivating and collecting alfalfa seed.

The seed thus secured will be used to reseed overgrazed and otherwise depleted ranges within national forests, and it is planned to introduce the plant upon many dry ranges to which it has hitherto been a stranger. The success of this movement means much to the stockmen using national forest ranges. In the southwest many a stock owner has been saved from heavy loss or even absolute ruin by the alfalfa that covered his spring ranges at a time when other early feeds were lacking and sustained his cattle until the advance of the season produced other sources of feed supply, and it is probable that the plant will be as valuable in other portions of the country.
